

ABSTRACT

A radio frequency transceiver for a wireless local area network (LAN) may have two or more antennae. An active antenna that delivers a data-bearing signal having a signal quality at least as good as any of the antennae may be selected based upon measurements of the signal quality during a preamble field of data frames having a substantially longer preamble field than other data frames.